WHY ANGEL COIN?

With the rise of cryptocurrency tokens as a new asset class, the question of the fair evaluation of a cryptocurrency token has become a question of increasing importance. We estimate the pricing kernel with which users price factors affecting their token holdings. We investigate how traditional risk factors such as market risk are evaluated, as well as how blockchain-specific risk factors are priced in. In order to do so, we introduce an asset pricing model and modify its properties to make it applicable to cryptocurrency markets. We group the risk factors into market-related and Bitcoin- and Ethereum blockchain-specific risk factors. We find that blockchain-specific risk factors are priced in. There is evidence that risk factors have moved from Bitcoin to Ethereum specific risk factors with the increasing importance of market factors, providing evidence for a decoupling of on-chain and off-chain trading activity.
